It’s 6,450 miles from Boynton Beach to the Great Pyramid of Giza. Tonight, that distance will seem so much closer when you join us to travel the world and learn about historic architectural styles and visit the oldest civilization known to mankind. Sharon Koskoff will illustrate Art Deco structures around the globe and focus on her passionate journey to the pyramids of Egypt, where she explored the tomb of King Tutankhamen and the ancient discoveries by Howard Carter in 1922 when everything Egyptian became all the RAGE! The Egyptian skyline is a visual feast and explains how Art Deco originates stylization of forms found in these

A Fly on The Wall

Randall Gill, President of the Boynton Beach Historical Society, visited Nanie and Curtis Weaver as they reflected on life in early Boynton. This was their last interview before they both passed away in 2020. This is a springtime reminiscence that they shared. Curtis was past president, and both were active members, of the Society.

Each spring in the pioneer town of Boynton, a plague would descend upon the community. Huge horseflies would come in droves to bite and annoy the townspeople. Mules would wear straw hats and were draped with kerosene-soaked cloths to protect them from the insects’ bites. The beauty of the cobalt blue ocean seemed like paradise, but the bite from a horsefly brought the pioneers back to reality. The horseflies received their name from feeding on horses and other livestock. At the Boynton schoolhouse (now home to the Schoolhouse Children’s Museum & Learning Center), the horseflies buzzed so loud against the windowpanes that it was almost impossible to concentrate. These pioneers recalled how the horseflies flew in like the swallows of Capistrano. One Monday they were there and two weeks later they were gone. They made life very uncomfortable, especially since the windows didn’t have screens. The horseflies just took over. One teacher kept two students at a time swatting at the flies and rotated them so that the students could do their work. Another student collected dead flies in a quart jar and took them home to feed to the chickens.

I recently confirmed that chickens do eat horseflies with someone who raises chickens. Curtis and Nanie Weaver encountered the horseflies as children. Curtis smiled and laughed, and said, “Oh, yes, the flies were pests. I remember hearing them hit the windows in class.” The sash and weight windows didn’t have screens in the old grade school. The windows opened to a good ocean breeze. They had to be closed when it rained because it soaked the floor.

Curtis said, “I remember a boy in class who caught a horsefly and tied a string around it. It took off into the air and he was holding the string. The class howled with laughter as the horsefly buzzed around the children’s heads like a kite in the sky.” Curtis and Nanie still laughed about old school memories from over 80 years ago. Curtis said, “Back in those days we made our own fun.” Nanie added, “It was a simple time and we enjoyed jump rope, jacks, hopscotch, baseball, dodgeball and going to the beach.”

A Conundrum Seeking Solutions: Identifications Sought

Georgen Charnes, City of Boynton Beach Library Archivist, recently received 14 senior portraits of the Boynton High Class of 1945. She was able, by comparing to other photos in the archives, and poring through back issues of The Historian, to identify most. However, she is left with a mystery that she hopes our membership can solve.

According to a Palm Beach Post article, 17 diplomas were given out at the Boynton High graduation ceremony in 1945. One graduate, Albert T. Peterson, was noted as already being in the U.S. Navy. This may explain why there are only 16 in the group portrait (below). All but two of the senior portraits have been identified leaving three photos unidentified (see below). They might be Jacqueline Tattersall and Muriel DeLoach. And who is the third girl? Maybe a student who didn't graduate that year, or maybe just didn't attend the ceremony and then wasn't listed in the newspaper? If you can identify these young women, your help would be appreciated. Georgen can be reached at charnesg@bbfl.us or 561-742-6390.

The History of City Hall

One of the recent displays in the Boynton Beach City Library was on the History of City Hall. Researching the display resulted in the usual down-the-rabbit-hole experience of historical discovery, and I’m left with some answers and more questions. Included below are photos of City Hall throughout the years.

The history of the first ten years of Boynton’s Town Hall is a little uncertain. The first public meeting concerning town incorporation, held 27 February 1920, was at Boynton Lumber Company, where it was decided to restart the process (a previous attempt in 1917 was not completed). On 14 April 1920, the resolution of incorporating the town of Boynton was passed and officers elected at the same place. On 12 June 1920, the first meeting of the Town Council of the Town of Boynton Florida was held at the Masonic Hall, which according to Boynton Lodge No. 236, was in a back room near where Bud’s Chicken is today but has also been recorded that the group met in the Harrell Building, which was on the south side of the 500 block of E. Ocean Avenue. Town Council Meetings were held at the Masonic Hall until 13 August 1920, when they were held in the “Town Hall,” location unspecified. It may have been the same space, but just called a new name.

In January 1924, the Sanborn Insurance Map (see https://www.boynton-beach.org/library/archives-research) recorded the Town Hall as located at the south end of the plot at the southwestern corner of E. Ocean Avenue and the FEC railroad tracks. In November 1927, I found two mentions that the Town Hall had, until recently, been in a room in the Harrell Building. A newspaper article written in 1961 notes that the Town Hall was in a building adjacent to the old bank building before 1930, so perhaps that’s where it moved to from the Harrell Building.

In 1930, the Town Hall offices moved into the old Bank of Boynton building after the bank failed, at the southeast corner of Ocean Avenue and U.S. 1/Federal Highway. The Town Hall remained there until moving into a new building on U.S. 1, where the current Veteran’s Memorial Park is located. The site also held the Fire Station and a water tower.

In 1958, City Hall moved to a new building at the corner of Boynton Beach Boulevard & Seacrest as part of a complex with the Fire Department, Police Station, and parking garage. It was later extensively remodeled, reopening in 1989. These buildings were demolished in 2018, and the newest City Hall opened in 2020, where the Local History Archives is located on the second floor.
